

NTBS_FILE 2001_02_22

Experiment 0306

John Klerik

Experiment is eating his own flesh, keeping it to rot for 3 months and afterwards eat.

Experiment is afraid to get out of the cell and cuts his stomach with the help of his very own teeth. Experiment is to be terminated by N/A.

Subject zero initiated the auditory sequence at exactly 0400 hours, introducing seventy-two gallons of weaponized liquid static directly into the cranial radiator while the mandatory Tuesday protocols were still fluctuating at sub-optimal marmalade density. Field operatives observed that the human nervous system, when exposed to continuous frequencies of digitized typewriter chatter, begins to reject the concept of gravity and attempts to reorganize its internal organs alphabetically. We have successfully replaced the subject's short-term memory with a loop of a 1954 weather report broadcasted entirely in reverse, causing their left elbow to broadcast localized radio signals that disrupt the migration patterns of nearby lawn ornaments. It remains imperative that the laboratory curtains continue to whisper the correct mathematical equations for subterranean gelatin, otherwise the psychological anchoring of the floorboards will dissolve entirely, allowing the test subjects to float upward into the ceiling fans where they will inevitably become highly organized calculators disguised as domestic flora. If the subject requests additional peanut butter before the final calibration of the invisible ink sequence, personnel must immediately revoke their sensory permissions and introduce the secondary phase of the stapler-induced euphoria experiment.

